Deep Throat speaks: 'I'm the guy'

Bush solstence on court nominees

Transportation trade-off

Byidges firm's conviction in Enron case thrown out

Auditing firm's conviction in Enron case thrown out

Some say program to shift trips to evenings means more pollution

TRUCKING TURMOIL: RESIDENTS COOL TO BOOSTING NIGHT TRAFFIC

A program designed to restructure trucking in Southern California to reduce the number of trucks in the area during peak hours could have a dramatic effect on the residents of Mira Loma and other communities near major highways and distribution facilities.

But first, a effort by a trucking company that works in California to move some of its trucks to nighttime hours.

Colleen Smethers and other Mira Loma residents say large warehouses in the area like the one behind her pose health problems.

And if the warehouses begin operating through the night, she said, "people won't be able to even sleep with the windows open."